Trump uses diplomacy to oust Nicolas Maduro: President Donald Trump likes to boast about his disruptive foreign policy style — calling North Korea's leader "Little Rocket Man" or announcing plans to pull troops from Syria without notifying his top generals.But with Venezuela, Trump is playing it uncharacteristically straight, using textbook diplomacy that he usually shuns in seeking the ouster of President Nicolas Maduro. Instead of going it alone, Trump has leaned on a patient mix of sanctions, behind-the-scenes diplomacy. —BLOOMBERG

Google, Amazon want smart devices to mine more of your data

MATT DAY
Seattle, February 12

The two tech giants say they collect the data to make it easier for people to manage their home electronics —BLOOMBERG

AS AMAZON AND Google work to place their smart speakers at the centre of the internet-connected home, both technology giants are expanding the amount of data they gather about customers who use their voice software to control other gadgets. For several years, Amazon and Google have collected data every time someone used a smart speaker to turn on a light or lock a door. Now they're asking smart-home gadget makers such as Logitech and Hunter Fan to send a continuous stream of information.

In other words, after you connect a light fixture to Alexa, Amazon wants to know every time the light is turned on or off, regardless of whether you asked Alexa to toggle the switch. Televisions must report the channel they're set to. Smart locks must keep the company apprised whether or not the front door bolt is engaged.

This information may seem mundane compared with smartphone geolocation software that follows you around or the trove of personal data Facebook vacuums up based on your activity. But even gadgets as simple as light bulbs could enable tech companies to fill in blanks about their customers and use the data for marketing purposes. Having already amassed a digital record of activity in public spaces, critics say, tech companies are now bent on establishing a beachhead in the home."You can learn the behaviours of a household based on their patterns," said Brad Russell, who tracks smart home products for researcher Parks Associates. "One of the most foundational things is occupancy. There's a lot they could do with that."

Some device makers are pushing back, saying automatic device updates don't give users enough control over what data they share, or how it can be used. Public guidelines published by Amazon and Google don't appear to set limits on what the companies can do with the information they glean about how people use appliances.

Amazon and Google say they collect the data to make it easier for people to manage their home electronics. Automatic status updates reduce the time it takes to process voice commands and lets smart-home hubs present up-to-date information on a screen or smartphone app. Greater awareness of what's going on also lets them proactively suggest helpful uses for their voice assistants, and develop new ones.

Smart speakers are among the fastest growing categories of consumer electronics, led by Amazon's Echo and Google's Home devices. That has pushed the companies and their Alexa and Assistant software deeper into debates about the tradeoffs between useful services and the harvesting of personal data. Both have had public pratfalls around privacy of voice commands, either recording private messages in error or sending them to others. The success of voice assistants has bolstered many firms to build interest in internet-enabled televisions, kitchen appliances and other devices. —BLOOMBERG
